Abstract

The purpose of this study was to examine whether it is possible to detect possibly malicious tweets posted by so-called trolls by inspecting the usage of sources such as url links, hashtags, user mentions and other media between clusters of tweets. This was done by utilizing the latent dirichlet allocation algorithm to find and assign topics to every tweet, clustering the tweets through their topics with the k-means algorithm. The resulting clusters was iterated through and data fetch and summarized to examine any difference between the clusters. The results suggest that this method for finding trolls is, in combination with a lexical study of the tweets text, plausible.

Sammanfattning

Syftet bakom denna studie var undersöka ifall det är möjligt att detektera sannolikt illvilliga tweets postad av så kallade troll genom att inspektera användandet av källor såsom url-länkar, hashtaggar, omnämnande av användare och annan media mellan olika kluster av tweets. Detta utfördes med hjälp av latent dirichlet allocation algoritmen för att finna och tildela ämnen till varje tweet, där tweeten klustrades på deras ämnestilldelning med hjälp k-means metoden. De resulterande klustrena itererades igenom och data från tweeten hämtades och summerades för att undersöka skillnader mellan klustrena. Resultaten antyder att denna metod tillsammans med en analys av tweetens text är möjligtvis lämplig för att detektera troll.

1. Introduction

There is a widespread use of social media today, especially by the younger parts of most populations with Internet access. The benefits of these services are many. Connecting people across the world, allowing them to update each other of their current status and perhaps renew old friendships with say, old classmates. This is not the only service offered by different social media platforms, with examples such as Facebook’s events where the users may coordinate, announce and promote upcoming events, but is the key service of social media. Through the ease of befriending or following other members and thus partake in their updates and shared statuses, customizing your news feed and more importantly, permitting information to quickly distribute over the network the user is part of. Naturally, they in turn may also share that information to their friends and propagate it themselves, that is to say if the update is eye catching enough. Thus something posted by a renown and well received member of the community, or a particularly cute cat photo with a striking caption may quickly reach to the furthest ends of the social network.

However, the fast propagation of information is not entirely unproblematic. If the information shared across the social media is false, it might possibly misinform a large group of users. This is further confounded if a well renowned member of the community with many followers was to share it, increasing the rate of the spread due to their larger groups of users following them. Furthermore, there is also the problem of users attempting to directly misinform other members by utilizing fake stories. While the end goals of these attempts are only known by these individuals, the consequences of their actions are real with widespread confusion. Two examples of such cases are The Columbian Chemical Hoax[11] where stories of a terror attack against a chemical factory in Louisiana, and the more recent pizzagate debacle[12]. A pizzeria was, according to rumors, harbouring a child trafficking ring led by the presidential candidate Hillary Clinton of the 2016 election. These rumours ultimately resulted in the arrest of a man who went to investigate himself.

There is therefore clearly a need in today’s society where informations travels almost freely and fast to be able to discern whether the data, or the poster, is trustworthy or not. Studies have already been conducted on the subject of verifying updates on social media and clustering potentially fraudulent users together[6,10], so this study will focus on clustering users together and examining the usage of sources by individuals in the different groups.
1.1 Purpose

The purpose of this study is to investigate the correlation of source usage, contained within the entity field of a tweet, between clusters of tweets to determine if that is a viable method of finding cases of fraudulent information tweeted to misinform other members of the network.

1.2 Scope

This study will focus on the social media platform Twitter and derive its data therefrom. The scope will also be further limited by the choice of a few topics related to politics to filter the tweets by, and to the English Twitter sphere. See appendix 1 for exact filter words used. Lastly, only latent dirichlet allocation and k-means will be used to cluster the tweets.
2. Background

2.1 Twitter

Twitter is a social media platform focusing on what is happening right now in every thinkable subject. The service was created in 2006 is as of now one of the most popular web services available today. Registered users may submit tweets, posts containing links, photos, videos and up to 140 characters of text. These tweets may also be retweeted, re-uploading the original tweet by other members. With the combination of followers who can directly see these updates whenever posted enables a rapid spread of information in between members of the Twitter sphere, increasing the chance of visibility to outsiders. Through following users of Twitter may customize their feed of tweets by their choice of accounts to follow, thus avoiding trudging through posts deemed unimportant. By the usage of hashtags, posters are able to easily connect their tweets to certain subjects, trends or events for further visibility. The claim of Twitter being a source of news is supported by the article What is Twitter, a Social Network or a News Media? [1].

Twitter also maintain their own APIs, Application Programming Interface, [15] to ease the use of their services. Through certain libraries calls can be made to these interfaces. Relevant to this study is the Streaming API and the tweet and entity objects specified in the documentation. The Streaming API includes the services needed to set up public filtered stream that will fetch tweets containing keywords of the filter. Furthermore, it is in entity field of the tweet object that urls, hashtags, user mentions and other media such as pictures, gifs and videos can be found if the tweet contain any of them.

2.2 Trolls

Internet trolls are users, often using fake accounts or anonymity to hide their real identities, partaking in the act of trolling others. Oxford's Dictionary [13] defines trolling, and by that extension trolls, as “Make[ing] a deliberately offensive or provocative online post with the aim of upsetting someone or eliciting an angry response from them”. The motivation behind this behavior is usually fun at the expense of the victim. This study will focus on a particular kind of troll, namely the kind that intentionally and consciously posts false information to misinform other users. In contrast to the first form of trolling, motivation here differs. While it is still possibly done for fun at the expense of the victims, it may also be done to create confusion and havoc in the relevant community. In the article The agency [11] the author hints at the involvement of the Russian government in the hoax. Different organizations utilizing this technique to sway public opinion is further supported by Chen, Wu, Srinivasan, and Zhang[5].
2.3 Emoticons and emojis

A picture of usually a facial expression, using only text characters in the case of emoticons. Often used to depict different feelings such as laughter, love and anger. One key difference between them is how emoticons usually are tilted to the side while emojis are viewable without tilting your head.

More importantly, emojis exists as characters in the unicode charmap which is the encoding Twitter is using to encode every tweet. This has the benefit of preserving the emoji whenever a text is cleaned of punctuation. Twitter does not, however, automatically transform an emoticon to its emoji equivalent. Thus this study will focus solely on emojis and refer to such when using the term emoticon.

2.4 Topic modelling

Topic modelling is a statistical model used in text mining which aims to, by grouping words of similar kind and subject together into topics, determine which of these topics are contained in a particular document. However, before running this tool over a text it needs to be trained with a corpus of documents, a wordlist and a predetermined number of topics. Every encountered word is included in the wordlist, and the word frequency in the corpus. The words are also split among the different topics. Naturally, different documents and texts may include several topics, but in varying degrees. The resulting numbers on the topics of a text will then be used to cluster the posts. The Troll detection study[6] is an example where this method is used.

2.4.1 Latent Dirichlet Allocation

Given a number of topics to find and a corpus, LDA tries to figure out what these topics are by figuring out which words are associated to them. This is done by assuming that every document in the corpus is composed of a mixture of topics and iterating through them and taking note of the words contained within and assigning them randomly to a topic. This distribution is then improved by iterating through the words in every document multiple times, calculating two things:

1. \( P(\text{topic } t \mid \text{document } d) \), the probability of the proportion of words in \( d \) currently assigned to \( t \), or how prevalent the topic \( t \) is in document \( d \).
2. \( P(\text{word } w \mid \text{topic } t) \), the probability of the proportion of \( w \) to \( t \) over all documents, or how prevalent the word \( w \) is across topics \( t \).

The word \( w \) is then transferred to topic \( t \) with probability \( P(\text{topic } t \mid \text{document } d) \times P(\text{word } w \mid \text{topic } t) \), essentially assuming every word other than the current is in its correct topic and updating the assignment if necessary.
Essentially the algorithm guesses that if a word \( w \) appears in document \( d \) and \( w \) belongs to topic \( t \) then it is expected to find other words from the same topic in the document. If a word is assigned to an incorrect topic, such as when the algorithm is unable to find any other words of the same topic, then there is a chance that word will be reassigned to a more fitting one. These guesses becomes more accurate after each iteration and after a while the assumptions are good enough and i no more need of updating.

2.5 Clustering

Clustering is the method of grouping together different points of data according to a predetermined metric. Data points in the same cluster should be more similar than a data point from another cluster. There exists various methods and algorithms to conduct the clustering, and which the k-means method is one of them.

2.5.1 K-Means method

As mentioned the k-Means method is an algorithm clustering points of data into \( k \) clusters. Every cluster is assigned a mean as a first step of computing the collections and allocating every data point to the closest mean. Calculating a new mean is then done from the newly allocated points of data, redistributing a point whenever its closest mean changes to the new cluster. These two steps are then repeated until the clusters stabilize. It is worth mentioning that while the k-Means method is a NP-complete problem, there fortunately exists efficient heuristic algorithms, sidestepping the issue.

2.6 Previous studies

2.6.1 Information on Twitter

The detection of malicious users in a network is important. According to a study from 2010[1] where the writers studied the topological landscape of Twitter over 85% of the trending topics circulating the network were news related. Moreover, their study indicates every retweet tweet will reach an average number of 1000 users, regardless of the numbers of followers to the account responsible of the original tweet. This process then gets repeated over again almost instantly, signifying the speed of which the information can travel over the social network. Furthermore, this is of greater importance due to more and more people getting their news from social media, according to a Canadian study by Hermida, Fletcher, Korell and Logan[2]. They concluded this from an online survey answered by 1600 participants, where three fifths claimed they got their news from people they followed, followed individual journalists, or other organizations on social media services. The article SOCIAL MEDIA AS BEAT: Tweets as a news source during the 2010 British and Dutch elections[3] also indicates the evolution journalism with the 2010 elections in Great Britain and Netherlands where a quarter of the British and almost half of the Dutch candidates voiced their opinions on Twitter, and an increased amount of them were quoted in the news. This, they suggested, was indicating how the balance of power between the journalist and the source might change in favour of the latter.

When it comes to disinformation, two studies[4, 5] concerning political abuse respective concludes that through various methods it is possible detecting users trying to game the system in their advantage. According to the investigations the methods are possible through a combination of machine learning, topology and content in the case of the former and behavioral patterns in latter case.

2.6.2 Troll detection

While trolls might not only aim to misinform others, it is a part of their repertoire. So how do we find them? A paper[6] from last year by another pair of KTH students addresses the very same subject, namely troll detection, and provides some answers. The focus of their paper was that from a predetermined troll examine if they could create cluster of other possible trolls through various means. Their selected methods of clustering were two types of topic modelling and the k-means method. The key difference between their study and this is the lack of a predetermined troll, instead aiming to detect them on topic modelling and clustering alone. The ability to determine clusters with the k-means algorithm by topic values is further supported by another research paper[7] where the authors used this approach to group together over 8000 different users according to what content they shared from the New York times online paper. These results suggested that these approaches were promising. Another study in the field of troll detection is Accurately Detecting Trolls in Slashdot Zoo via Decluttering[8]. Here the researchers go in depth about identifying trolls in a signed social network and describe an algorithm called TIA (Troll Identification Algorithm). By identifying possible patterns of malicious activity and then performing a set of decluttering operations counteracting them the authors claim their algorithm is able to determine benign and malicious user in the signed social network. The authors state that these decluttering operations are critical to the algorithm, as benign user might be labeled as a malicious and vice versa otherwise. This could be interesting to use in conjunction with clusters to examine whether the whole set is composed of trolls, or whether this subgroup have its own trolls.

A group of researchers utilized machine learning to determine the statistical possibility of an account owned by a real person was associated with a fake account conducting defamatory activities in their study[9], and a description where it was implemented in a real life situation to stop cases of bullying in a school. This study suggests that there is a methodology to link user to each other through the content of respective account. This could be used for clustering users together by their produced content.

2.6.3 Information credibility

Finally in the article Information Credibility on Twitter[10], the authors analyze whether trending topics on Twitter is newsworthy, in other words if it is credible or not. This is done by examining certain features of the tweets such as the behavior of posting and reposting, content of the post and citation of external sources. Their findings indicate that topics considered trustworthy usually included URLs and deeper trees of propagation than those topics of more untrustworthy nature. Furthermore their results show that in addition to these constraints more trustworthy trending stories on Twitter were usually posted from users with a greater amount of posts and had a source of single or few users. Thus they claimed there is a measurable difference between credible and noncredible tweets and their automatic method of determining this had a precision of 70 to 80 %.

2.6.4 Summary

The studies concerning information on twitter showcases why this is an important issue in the age of information. Furthermore, as the paragraph on troll detection suggest, research have been conducted on this very subject. This might turn out useful to detect trolls, presenting the opportunity to examine proposed metrics of their posts, but hopefully they will remain detectable by just the same metrics. Finally, the credibility of different clusters might provide an interesting point and a hint of the nature of the users therein.
3. Method

3.1 Software used
The language Python was used in conjunction with the following external libraries to construct the programs used in this study: Tweepy, nltk, gensim and scikit-learn[14, 16, 18, 17].

3.2 Gathering the data
A range of search terms were chosen to acquire tweets from possibly malicious members, all whom related to the topic of politics. See appendix 1 for used keywords. The tweets were gathered under a brief period of a few minutes.

Tweets were gathered by using Twitter’s Streaming API, setting up a filtered stream. To this purpose the third party python module tweepy[14] was used. Whenever a status update contained a keyword in the filter the contents of it were saved in their json format for further use. Used keywords are available in appendix 1.

The Streaming API was chosen due to returning more complete results than the alternative, the REST API, from whom the results from queries sent by the API was returned based on Twitter’s own measure of relevancy.

3.3 Clustering the tweets
After gathering a total of 848 tweets the data was first cleaned of stop words, punctuation, words not contained in the US english dictionary and terms only appearing once with the help of the nltk module[16] to properly prepare to the next step by filtering out unnecessary noise. Of these tweets 169, a fifth, were separated from the rest and constructing a corpus with them used in training the lda model. The lda model used was provided by the library gensim[18], setting 10 as the number of wanted topics to find in the constructed corpus. These topics was then inferred onto the rest of the tweets in the set, represented as a vector of to which degree each topic was found in each tweet.

Lastly, the assigned vectors were used in the k-means method to cluster the tweets, setting the number of desired clusters as 5. The library scikit-learn’s[17] k-means method was utilized to compute the clusters, updating the tweets with the resulting cluster indices.

The lda and the k-means methods were picked due to them being deemed promising to detect trolls in the study Troll Detection by Du and Söderberg[6].
3.4 Analyzing the clusters

After the preprocessing the tweets of each clusters were iterated through, fetching the field for the entities contained therein to compile each cluster together. The compiled clusters were then iterated through, counting occurrences of non empty entity fields, url objects contained within the entity and mentions of other users to determine the source usage of users in the different clusters.

Furthermore, the text message contained within every tweet outside of the corpus set were gathered and compiling by cluster into documents. These documents were then passed onto a word cloud generator to help visualize any difference in word usage to possibly help detect a cluster of trolls.
4. Results

4.1 Clusters

Fig 2, a bar diagram showcasing the distribution of tweets over the five clusters

The total amount of tweets in each of the 5 clusters, the result of the k-means clustering.
Fig 3.1, topic distribution in a 2 dimensional space
In figure 3.1 and 3.2 the distribution of topics when collapsed to 2 and 3 dimensional space to help visualize the clusters due to the topic vectors of each tweet being 10 dimensional. The decomposition was done with Principal Component Analysis. In fig 3.2 purple corresponds to the colour black in fig 3.1 and orange to yellow.
4.2 Word clouds

The word clouds were generated by the concatenation of every tweet text mapped to a cluster. The bigger the word in the cloud, the greater frequency of its appearance within said cluster. The 4 colours of the clouds carry no actual meaning.

Fig 5, Occurrences of entity objects within tweets per cluster

Represented above is the total count of objects within the entity field of every tweet mapped to its corresponding cluster. As discussed before, the entity field of a tweet may consist of hashtags, url links, mentions of other users and other media. Media refer to in this case pictures, gifs and videos. The entity columns represents if anything was contained in the entity field.
5. Discussion

5.1 Research errors

From figure 2 we can see how the proportion of tweets peer cluster is heavily skewed towards cluster 4. This trend was further observed when the number of clusters was varied, however, the higher the amount of clusters computed with the k-means method the less prominent this variance was between clusters. This might be due to the topics mapped to cluster 4 relate to a slightly higher degree to politics and news. The second biggest cluster’s word cloud, number 1, also showcases this to some degree with terms possibly relating to political news. Moreover, this notion of increased size due to topics associated to news aligns with the earlier discussed paper What is Twitter, a Social Network or a News Media?[1]. Figure 3.1 and 3.2 are furthermore showcasing a concentration of data points, where the colours black and purple corresponds to the cluster of index 4. This explains why the difference of tweets mapped to increases when the amount of clusters to find is set to a lower value.

Furthermore, there is also the possibility of the data set being too small. A larger set than only 848 tweets could provide a better result, but one issue that surfaced during the study was the runtime of the latent dirichlet allocation algorithm and should be taken into consideration in future studies. The topics of gathered tweets would also depend on the current events, which due to being collected during such short time period, limiting the topics found when running the lda algorithm. While the short time span is of certain concern, the usage of common words of a language broadens the amount of tweets found by the filter of the stream. This can be seen in the word clouds of fig 4.1 to 4.5, where the gathering step happened during the vote of k-pop stars. This is most likely due the inclusion of the common word “is”, which was incorporated with reference to the Islamic State terrorist group.

One detail worthy of consideration would be removing any url links from the documents used to compute the word clouds associated with each cluster, due to abundance of them in figures 4.1 - 4.5. Special care should be taken to not remove everything outside the english language lest valuable information of the clouds be lost in the form of hashtags and emojis.
5.2 Noticeable results

A point of interest from the results is cluster 0, where the degree of hashtag usage is in relation to the total amount of entities is higher than the rest. In addition, the corresponding word cloud also features a few prominent terms such as showed, first, trump, vote, award and social, with some of these terms appearing multiple times in the cloud. This might be due to the high number of retweets referring to the same tweet, inflating a few words as seen in figure 4.1 and appendix 2.1. The greater amount of tweets containing hashtags relative to cluster size could be explained by an ongoing vote occurring at the time the data was gathered, which is visible in appendix 2.1.

If any cluster had to pinpointed as a cluster incorporating trolls, the highest probability of finding a user posting fraudulent information with malicious intent would be in the first cluster 0, based on the nature of some of the retweets contained in appendix 2.1.

6. Conclusion

Due to the similar ratios of different entities included in tweets between all but one cluster, the method of detecting trolls by analyzing and inferring topics with a lda model onto tweets and using the k-means method to group the according to those scores and simply summarize included entity objects is not plausible on its own. In a best case scenario it might only provide an indication. But in conjunction with studying the lexical content, such as with word clouds for example, this seems a bit more conceivable as to strengthen this indication. However, to reach a definitive conclusion whether a cluster contains a troll or not there still remains the need to actually read the contents of the tweets of a cluster.
