Identification and recording of patient's needs and preferences are fundamental in planning and providing nursing care. Structured, coded data in nursing that computers can manage have been lacking in hospitals in Iceland which results in incomplete health care data potentially affecting quality of care, patients' safety and invisibility of nursing. The focus in this thesis is on the applicability, content, and accuracy of nursing data recorded with standardised nursing languages in clinical practice and their role in supporting nurses as knowledge workers.